police officers need most

discernment

Police officers face a lot of uncertain situations during which they have to make split-second decisions, which can have life-altering consequences - for everyone involved. They need discernment to know the best decision to make in any situation.

physical + emotional safety

Police officers run toward situations most people run away from, and while they're trained to do so and have equipment to help protect them, their personal safety is always at risk.

healthy relationships

Because their job is so demanding and emotionally draining, their relationships with their spouse, their kids, and their friends and family can suffer.

Because they see so much of the bad in the world, police officers need hope that people can change, that there's more good in the world than bad, and that they're actually making a difference.

comfort

Police officers see the worst things the world has to offer, and those things aren't easy to forget - or even make sense of. They're in need of comfort and support to overcome the emotional impact of these things.

unfailing faith

Police officers see so much pain, destruction, and horror. They're in need of a witness of God's hand in all things and an understanding of His plan, as well as a firm knowledge that He is always good, even when the world is not.
